What does the FFA really say?

It says...here is this family's history and actions, not what the CPI did.
It says...this is the maltreatment, severity, and maltreating caregiver.
It says...these are the findings of that maltreatment.
It says...this is what led up to the maltreatment and the intent.
It says...this is the reconciled explanation from all people involved.
It says...this is the history regarding this maltreatment.
It says...here is a picture of who this child is aside from the incident.
It says...this is who these adults are aside from the incident.
It says...here is how aspects of their lives may or may not impact them.
It says...here is a caregiver’s general nature and approach to parenting.
It says...this is how the caregiver guides and teaches the child.
It says...these are the caregiver’s expectations for discipline.
It says...here is how the caregiver manages a child’s daily behaviors.
It says...I have reconciled all information and here is my analysis.

What happened or did not happen? What are the family conditions?

How does your documentation answer these questions?

What’s The Impact in Saying “That”?

Saying that...succinctly paints a picture of who this family is as an entire household.
Saying that...clarifies the presence or absence of danger threats associated with each domain.
Saying that...supports our justification of the presence or absence of caregiver protective capacities.
Saying that...provides an accurate reflection of the family’s strengths and needs.
Saying that...offers an “on the record” analysis for safety decision making.
Saying that...captures each domain and informs decision making.
Saying that...reflects sufficient information collection in all areas of assessment.
Saying that...justifies every decision regarding safety we make for this family.

Have you said enough to make an informed decision about child safety and caregiver protective capacities?
